ON UKRAINE:
Writing just before she became prime minister for a second time in 2007, Yuliya Tymoshenko warns that the Kremlin has returned to expansionism and urges the United States and Europe to counter with a strong response—one that keeps Russia in check without sparking a new Cold War.

ON PUTIN:
Political science professor Brian Taylor argues that Russian President Vladimir Putin is not as strong as he seems and that it would be unwise to underestimate how badly his adventure in Crimea could turn out for him and for Russia.

ON GERMANY:
Political science professor Mitchell Orenstein explains that, until now, France and Germany have had the most say over Europe’s trajectory. But as the EU moves eastward, including to places like Ukraine, it is Germany and Russia that will decide who is in, who is out, and under what terms.

ON ENERGY:
Energy expert Brenda Shaffer points out that speeding up U.S. natural gas exports to Europe won’t shield the continent from the Ukraine crisis. Europe’s own policies and infrastructure are far bigger problems.

Visit ForeignAffairs.com for more on these topics—and all our other great content.